What kind of image is a photograph? This lecture course investigates this question from the 19th century to the present, with particular emphasis on its role in the United States and Europe. We will discuss strategies for interpreting photographs and raise critical issues connected with the medium. This course will count toward the Fine Arts Divisional and/or the 1800-present requirement for the art history major. Art 259 is an elective in the Cultural Heritage and Preservation Studies Minor and the Journalism minor. No previous art history knowledge required.
